Justification for course proposal:

The Anthropology department currently offers three concentrations: 1) Archaeological and Biological Anthropology; 2) Cultural and Linguistic approaches; and 3) General Anthropology, since In 2015. The Department of Anthropology aims to restructure the current major concentrations, which aims to expand course offerings to meet the different requirements and collapse categories. This will improve degree progress by removing bottlenecks and provide more effective course sequencing and a wider array of courses that better reflects faculty expertise and allow students opportunity to engage with diverse faculty. Additionally, this will make the major more appealing by re-naming categories with language that students can better relate to and avoid confusion between "Major electives" and general university electives. As part of a curriculum redesign, prerequisites have been changed and learning outcomes/assessment strategies have been adjusted. The catalog course description has also been edited to reflect current course content. Form B to follow.

Course Description: (Not to exceed 90 words and language should conform to catalog copy.)

Far more than a geocultural space or "continent," Europe is an historically-potent social and ideological construction that has been instrumental in exerting global colonial power - a 'Europeanization' process that has turned increasingly inward with the goal of circumscribing diverse linguistic and cultural communities in a postcolonial world. The course focuses on major themes in contemporary Europeanist anthropology, such as relations between local communities/regions and states, immigration, subaltern groups, neo-nationalist extremism, and the changing character of religious institutions.
