Justification for course proposal:

The changes being introduced are:

1. Change of the name
2. Change of course description
3. Change to these particular prerequisites
4. Change of course classification to seminar

Changes numbered 1 and 2 above are being introduced to update the catalog course description language so that it reflects the current development in the field.

Changes numbered 3 and 4 are being introduced to reflect department-level curricular changes. These changes are geared toward providing students more flexibility for enrollment and enabling timely graduation. ANTH 141 or ANTH 146 provide ample exposure to the fundamentals of cultural anthropology preparing students to engage and appreciate and the specific issues addressed within the specialized field represented by this course. Either ANTH 160 or ANTH 162 also provide adequate preparation for the material in the class. Graduate students have always been eligible to take this, but had to be hand enrolled. Adding graduate student standing eliminates the need for office administrative staff to add graduate students manually.

Course Description: (Not to exceed 90 words and language should conform to catalog copy.)

Examines the cultural dimension of human rights. Explores the emergence, evolution, and global spread of the idea of human rights. Explores how the concept of human rights and related conventions are contested, appropriated, adapted, or rejected in different cultural, and political contexts. Critically explores human rights theories, practices, contemporary human rights issues, and debates. Using select case studies from around the world, highlights how the human rights discourse mediates the relationship between specific groups of people, their national states, international conventions, and institutions.
