Justification for course proposal:

Making minor changes as part of broader curriculum change in our department and concentration to streamline pathways to graduation. This course was dormant for several years before being reinvigorated in 2019 and additional changes (i.e. revised course description for currency, added prerequisites to help students succeed) in this form A reflect that history.

After long discussions, faculty arrived at the conclusion that ANTH 141 or ANTH 146 provide ample exposure to the fundamentals of cultural anthropology preparing students to engage and appreciate and the specific issues addressed within the specialized field represented by this course. Graduate students have always been eligible to take this, but had to be hand enrolled. Adding graduate student standing eliminates the need for office administrative staff to add graduate students manually.

Course Description: (Not to exceed 90 words and language should conform to catalog copy.)

This class focuses on ethnographic and theoretical understandings of an often taken-for-granted object, the body. Through engagement with anthropological and phenomenological literature, with intersectional emphases on gender, sexuality, race, class, and ability, we will develop an understanding of bodies as archives of social experiences and artifacts of historical processes.
