SUMMARY

Dr. Molitor has 29 years of experience as principal investigator/project director and lead analyst of studies in the areas of epidemiology, health services research, population-based behavioral surveillance, and the evaluation of community-based, multi-site projects. His teaching experience includes graduate and undergraduate research methodology and statistics courses, specifically in the areas of survey research. Dr. Molitor has worked with multi-disciplinary teams on numerous studies collaborating with Federal and State agencies, universities, hospital faculty and staff, local health departments, and persons from community-based organizations. The target for these studies has commonly been persons from marginalized populations, including persons of color and young children from lower-income families. Dr. Molitor has extensive experience with the activities required for evaluation design and survey data collection, including sampling, training staff in study protocols, constructing and pilot testing forms and questionnaires, and developing scientifically-sound research designs with consideration of the demands and skills of program staff. He is currently a member of the California Health and Human Services Agency's Committee for the Protection of Human Subjects. Dr. Molitor's doctoral education included a minor in Statistics and he has extensive experience using multivariate analytic techniques. He has been the lead statistician on over 60 peer-reviewed journal articles and 90 abstracts and papers accepted for presentation at national and international conferences.
